Senator Kevin Parker on the Supreme Court's Invalidation of the Core of the Voting Rights Act

KEVIN S. PARKER June 28, 2013

| ISSUE: ELECTIONS, VOTER PROTECTION

(Brooklyn, NY) “The decision made by the Supreme Court on Tuesday struck a blow against forty-eight years of progress away from the naked discrimination and voter suppression of the 1950s and ‘60s, when we struggled to end segregation and move toward equality.

The simple and overwhelming truth that the Court’s decision gets wrong, which even conservative Chief Justice Roberts admitted in the Court’s opinion, is that discrimination against racial, linguistic, religious and other minorities in the United States has not ended, no matter how much we might wish otherwise. In choosing however to “put a dagger through the heart of the Voting Rights Act,” to quote Congressman John Lewis, the Supreme Court has shown yet again how out of step it is with the values of our nation.

Now that the protection of section 4(b) is gone, voters facing disenfranchisement will have to file expensive lawsuits after their vote is suppressed, to try and restore their access to America’s most fundamental right, the right to vote. That is wrong, and violates our most basic values of fairness and equality, and reopens that dark era when racial and linguistic minorities could be deprived of their vote with impunity.

For as long as America has existed, there have been those who seek to limit the right of other Americans to vote. Sadly, the Supreme Court gave aid and comfort to those who fight to restrict the ability of millions of Americans to vote for the candidates of their choice.
