(Brooklyn, NY) - Senator Kevin Parker today announced new support by New York for post-partum services to new mothers and their families. The legislation signed into law today was introduced by Senator Liz Krueger, cosponsored by Senator Parker and five other Senators, and passed both houses of the Legislature with bi-partisan support.

“Sadly, maternal depression is far too common, and too many new mothers go untreated and suffer in silence unnecessarily,” Senator Parker said. “This law will increase awareness, promote early detection, and provide the treatment and resources for the more than 80% of women who experience some type of severe depression that can make all the difference following childbirth.”

The failure to treat postpartum depression rapidly and effectively in part arises because the symptoms of this type of maternal depression often go unnoticed. As a result, many new mothers and their children suffer needlessly and go untreated, sometimes leading to challenges for entire families and in physical harm to children in the most heartbreaking cases. Early screening and identification of postpartum depression has an 80%-90% success rate and offers long-term health care cost savings. Senator Krueger’s bill S.7234B, provides training to medical staff and resources and treatment to minimize the impact of maternal depression on new mothers and their families.

“Untreated maternal depression puts families at risk, and the consequences can be dire, but the suffering it causes can be avoided with proper diagnosis and treatment,” Senator Parker concluded. “I commend Governor Cuomo for signing this bill into law, and giving our community’s families the support they deserve.”
