Kamillah M. Hanks is a native Staten Islander, who has been a leader and advocate for smart growth and positive economic development in the North Shore of Staten Island for the past decade. Ms. Hanks is currently the founder and president of the Historic Tappen Park Community Partnership, Inc., where she partners with civic leaders, businesses, community groups and schools to boost cultural and economic development in the Stapleton area and surrounding community.

In January 2015, the Historic Tappen Park Community Partnership was named one of seven winners of New York City's "Neighborhood Challenge" award, which granted the local community-based organization $70,000, for its ambitious district-wide marketing campaign, and public art installation project called, "Illuminate Stapleton."

She currently serves as interim president of the Van Duzer Street Civic Association in Stapleton, and was the former executive director of the Downtown Staten Island Council, helping to lead the organization's effort to bring greater economic development to the Island's North Shore. She also served on the City Council Districting Commission in 2012. Ms. Hanks worked in public relations at the Staten Island Museum, the Staten Island Economic Development Corporation and Stanton Crenshaw Communications.

In 2001, Ms. Hanks worked with producers and starred in a Staten Island documentary short film, "Ferry Tales," which was nominated for an Academy Award in 2004.
