WHEREAS, In early 1800, Minerva was settled by many people from Vermont, and immigrants from Ireland; the West, Jones and Morse families were some of the first inhabitants of the Town; and

WHEREAS, Through the 1800s, most of the early settlers were self-sustaining farmers; the population remained stable at around 1,000 residents until 1900, when it began to steadily decline; farms were abandoned and a population low of 505 was reached in 1940; and

WHEREAS, The influx of mining at Tahawus, during and after World War II, brought a growth spurt with the population reaching nearly 700 by 1950; according to the 2010 Census, the Town of Minerva was inhabited by 809 citizens; and

WHEREAS, Minerva is primarily mountainous and almost entirely forested; the Hudson River forms the southwesterly boundary of the Town, with 15 miles of its course being in Minerva or forming its boundary; approximately 15 miles of the Boreas River, the entire lower half, is within the town; these 30 miles of river are essentially wild and unsettled being surrounded by New York State land, which makes up approximately 75% of all the land in the Town; and

WHEREAS, The cleared portion was once about 10,000 acres; today, about 1,000 acres are now occupied or cleared; the combination of natural and wild forest land with the man-made beauty of Minerva Lake and Donnelly Beach has made Minerva a popular destination for many tourists and locals; and
