Humbleness is important in today's society. Humbleness is an important quality that helps with many things such as leadership, decision making, and building relationships with others. If you are a humble leader, the people you lead will like you, and therefore those people will have trust and confidence in you. Decision making is greatly helped by being humble. Vain people will choose their first gut decision,  assuming that it is the right choice without thinking about if it makes sense or not. A humble person will evaluate their choices and if possible, ask other people what they think the right decision is. Humble people will learn from their mistakes, which also benefits decision making skills. Good leaders are considerate of other people and their opinions. Being considerate of others is an important part of being humble, because humble people don't only think about themselves. If an authority figure only thinks about themselves, they are likely to become a dictator. I am thankful that I am humble, and I am also thankful for the fact that many leaders and authority figures are also humble.

I feel that I am a humble person. Being humble means that you do not draw too much attention to yourself or what you have done, as humble is the opposite of vain and pretentiousness. Humbleness is important because if you think you know it all, you won't get far in life. For example, when I get a great grade I don't feel the need to show it off. I honestly don't like having a lot of attention drawn to myself, which is part of the reason I consider myself a relatively humble person. I don't like complaining about having to do too much work as it won't actually help me get away from that work. I'm not humble all the time, but nobody can show one quality all the time.